His touring schedule regularly includes countries that American based artists rarely (if ever) perform in, including Armenia, Uzbekistan, the United Arab Emirates, and cities such as Tashkent and Samarghand, among others, all the while spreading his universal message of love and joy.

A true humanitarian, Andy has contributed to many international charitable causes during the span of his career. He is an Officer of Voices Out, a 501(c)3 non-profit organization founded by his wife, Shani Rigsbee, a fellow singer/songwriter and film producer. Voices

Out's mission is to provide a voice and aid children and animals in neglectful, abusive and abandoned conditions both in the US and abroad. He was recognized twice by the mayor and City of LA, Mr. Eric Garcetti for his continued efforts to contribute his time and talent for the overall welfare of the city. He helped organize "We Hear Your Voice," a humanitarian song and video that promotes world peace and unity, with proceeds benefiting international children's charities (Written, Performed and produced by his wife Shani). Andy and Shani have also performed and produced many songs in different languages and toured the world together. Andy has donated countless hours and performances for fundraisers to help build medical clinics and to support medical facilities around the world. Due to his international popularity and philanthropic reputation, Andy was invited to perform at the One World Peace Concert with His Holiness the Dalai Lama and other musical artists in 2012. The concert was a celebration of music, peace, and common ground.

Born in Tehran, Iran, Andy's family came from humble beginnings. He grew up with nine people living in a small one-room house. But their house was filled with love, laughter, and most importantly for Andy, music.

As Andy was beginning to explore his musical roots, his native land entered into a turbulent period that led to a civil war. He made the decision to leave Iran, and moved to California with a student visa to play soccer for Cal State University LA. Despite starting from zero with no support network or place to live, Andy managed to make a life for himself in Los Angeles. He attended classes during the day and found work playing guitar at local clubs at night. From college, he auditioned for an American band, and went on tour with them around the US. Andy then formed the musical duo Andy and Kouros with fellow musician Kouros Shahmiri. The duo released four albums together before embarking on their respective solo careers.

Andy is credited for creating a new fusion of sound that combines the music of his Iranian-Armenian heritage with African rhythms, Spanish flamenco guitar licks, and Western dance music. His global, exotic sound reflects his international roots and experiences, which have allowed him to connect with millions of people around the world. Besides the profound respect Andy has for Persian and Armenian poetry, working with the same lyricist Paksima Zakipour for over twenty-nine years, he developed an abiding love for contemporary Middle-Eastern eastern music. With Paksima, together they have written countless number one hits and in Persian market they are known as the Elton John and Bernie Toppin. Andy also sings in English and Spanish, among other languages. Andy's music is banned in his own country of Iran, but his albums sell in the millions. However, all sales are bootlegged and done through underground channels. Consequently, his albums enormous popularity does not result in financial profit.

Today, Andy is the living proof of the American dream. A long-time resident of Los Angeles, the city's diversity and rich culture have helped to continue to fuel his unique sound that has catapulted him to international superstardom. Andy's songs may be a break from tradition, but young and old alike, from east to west, continue to pack his concerts and buy his albums.
